1. Certain patient and practice characteristics may contribute to the overuse of therapy at the end of life.

2. New treatments and cancer advances also are contributing to the trend of using futile preventive agents for comorbid conditions at the end of life.

3. Goals-of-care discussions are essential to help clinicians better understand patients’ wishes and to develop effective, patient-centered end-of-life care plans.